The farm adjoins the Tiffin River, and it is believed to have been inhabited by Indians as many arrowheads and stone tools have been found over the years. A natural gas pipeline from Texas to Detroit crosses the farm and the river. During WWII, a guard was posted at the river, armed with a pistol. The two wood farm sheds at the farm were German POW barracks moved from Defiance to the farm in the late 1950’s. The Tiffin River is an integral part of the farm having formed sand ridges and a rich river bottom loam following the end of the last ice age. This soil is much different from the typical lake bottom clays of the area and the Weber family takes pride in continuing to operate the family farm. A lasting memory or experience of this farm is growing up and working on the farm with family.
